The Right Style Carriage House

Carriage House is a popular design that offers a unique look to any garage. Aimed to mimic the appearance of a carriage house – an outbuilding designed to house horse-drawn carriages – this style is deceptively modern in its functionality. Increase your home value by an estimated 83% when you choose a Carriage House style garage door. It holds the highest ROI of any garage door style on the market today.

The Right Material

Choosing the right material for your garage door depends on your needs and desires for your home. Most garage doors today are made of steel simply because it is a durable material with an approachable cost.

However, there are many things to consider when choosing the right material for your garage door. Durable and low-cost may not be top priorities. You will want to weigh all of your options and consider

Steel

- Flush or Raised Panel Designs
- Durable and Energy Efficient

Natural Wood

- Unlimited Design Options & Wood Species
- Option for Paint or Stain
- Handcrafted

Insulation – Yes or No?

Depending on whether your garage is attached to your home or you have rooms above or adjacent, deciding on insulation can vary in degree of importance. A garage with attached rooms may call for better insulation than a garage that is completely detached and unheated.

Simply put, insulation is the material that has the ability to reduce heat or cold transmission. If insulation is of high importance, then knowing the R-value is essential. R-value is a number that represents the ability of a material to retard the transmission of heat. The higher the R-value, the better the door's insulating performance. If you spend a significant amount of time in your garage, you will want to purchase a door that offers a high R-value.

Cressy Door and Fireplace always recommends a garage door with ample insulation.
